The Loss of the Norhfleet."

H. H. TENNET. A ship with white wings folded close, Lies rocking on the deep,
While darkening clouds in gloomy ranks.
Across the heavens sweep.

They sweep the stars from out the sky, They wall the moon from sight. And trail across the ocean's breast The darkest robes of night.

The wild waves best their snowy hards Against the ship's dark brow;
The night wind shrieks and howls in pain,
Or whispers and and low.

Within that s ip, four hundred souls, The strong, the brave, the fair; Within those souls the joy of fife, No thought of death was there.

But death had clothed itself in life, And sought the fated back, And struck with all its awful force From out the shuddering dark. A steamer drives, in hurried cours

It steams away from the sinking ship, It goes out into the gloom, Into the dark with pityless hearts, And leaves the wrack its doom. What terror wild holds every heart Upon that wounded bark,
What prayers and shrieks of awful fear,
Thrill all the trembling dark.

One voice rings out among the rest. In calm and steady tones,
And "lower the boats" is clearly heard
